The Story of Geographical Discovery: How the World Became Known

Joseph Jacobs (1854 - 1916)

Published in 1897, this short work still determines the detailed geographical plan of our entire world, including dates, names, events, places and maps in a dense stream. The reader (or listener) will acquire a surprisingly complete overview of world history as well as geography. Beginning in ancient times, the author identifies three main forces that have contributed to our present understanding: wars of conquest, competition for trade, and scientific curiosity. The Egyptians, Phoenicians, early Greeks, Babylonians, and many other Mediterranean peoples contributed, often unwillingly, the streams of knowledge that Ptolemy of Alexandria summed up in the great Ptolemaei Orbis (ca. 150 AD), the first "real" map of the whole known world. The evolution of world maps to incorporate (and sometime conceal) new discoveries is a key theme of this fascinating work. (Summary by Steven Seitel)
